Justice Benaja was sitting in his office. Then a bull-cart bearing Ransie and his wife Ariela I stopped at his door. "We," said the woman, "want a divorce." "We can't get along together. It's lonesome enough to live in the mountains when a man and a woman cannot stand one another."

"The regular price of a divorce in this court," said the Justice, "is five dollars." Ransie paid the amount and the Judge stuffed the bill into his pocket. He then wrote the decree upon a piece of paper. The Justice was about to hand over the documents to Ransie, when Ariela interrupted him.

"If Ransie can afford a divorce, let him pay me alimony of five dollars." said Ariela.

"Ransie, you are ordered by the court to pay the plaintiff the sum of five dollars before the decree of divorce is issued." said the Justice.

"I have no more money," breathed Ransie. "I had paid you all I had."

"If you give me till tomorrow," pleaded the husband, "I will be able to rake or scrape it up somewhere."

"The case is adjourned," said the Justice, "till tomorrow."

Then while going home, Justice Benaja was stopped by a man, whose face was covered. He pointed a rifle at Justice Benaja and asked him for all the money he had. The Justice gave the only five dollars he had to the man.

The next day Ransie and his wife came to the Justice's office. In the presence of Justice, Ransie handed to his wife a five-dollar bill. The Justice handed each one a decree of divorce.

"I reckon you'll be going back up to the cabin," Ariela said to Ransie.

"You are going to your brother Ed's?" asked Ransie.

"I do not have any other place to go." said Ariela.

Ariela was silent. She folded the five-dollar bill and placed it in the pocket of her dress. The Justice watched the money disappear with mournful eyes behind his spectacles.

Ransie stared out towards his cabin. He did not look at Ariela.

"Want me to go back along with you in the cart and wind the clock, Ransie?" asked Ariela. Ransie reached out a big hand and enclosed Ariela's thin brown face. Her soul peeped out at once through her impassive face, hallowing it. "I will not pester you any more," said Ransie. "I reckon I have been mean and low."

"My heart is in that cabin, Ransie," she whispered, "along with you. I am not going to get mad any more. Lets be starting, Ransie". Justice Benaja interposed as they started for the door.

He said, "I forbid you from defying the court's decree. This court is more than willing to see the clouds of discord rolling away from two loving hearts. But it is the duty of the 35 court to preserve the morals of the State. You are no longer man and wife, since you are divorced. As such you are not entitled to the benefits of matrimony". "But the court is prepared," went on the Justice, "to remove the disabilities set up by the decree of divorce by performing the ceremony of marriage, enabling you to resume marital life. The fee for performing this ceremony will be five dollars."

Ariela caught the gleam of promise in his words and kept the bill on the Justice's table. Her sallow cheek coloured as she stood hand in hand with Ransie, listening to the reuniting words.
